How to Brief a Fashion Designer

(SO YOU GET WHAT YOU ACTUALLY PICTURED)

A SHORT GUIDE FOR FOUNDERS PREPARING FOR THEIR FIRST DESIGN CONVERSATION.

How to Brief a Fashion Designer

Every collection we've built started with a conversation. And the quality of that first conversation shapes almost everything that follows. When a founder comes in with a clear brief, the design process moves quickly and confidently. When the brief is unclear, both sides spend weeks working out what was meant.
The good news is that a strong brief doesn't need to be long or technical. It just needs to answer the right questions. Here's what we've learned helps founders get exactly what they pictured.

01 Start with who you're designing for.

Before colours, references or garments, tell us about your customer: their age, where they live, how they spend their day, and what they'd pay for a piece like yours. Every design decision we make runs through that person. The clearer they are, the sharper the collection becomes.

02 Share the practical details early.

The categories you want (streetwear, contemporary, eveningwear), roughly how many garments, your budget range and your launch timeline. These aren't restrictions. They're what let us shape a collection that's realistic from day one, rather than redesigning it later to fit.

03 Send references with notes, not just images.

A reference image tells us what caught your eye, but not why. "Like this, but different" can mean a hundred things. Add one line to each image: the fit, the colour, the fabric, the mood, or the one detail you love. That single line saves an entire round of revisions.

04 A seed of vision is enough.

You don't need the whole collection figured out. A seed might be a feeling, a problem you want to solve, or a single garment you can't stop thinking about. What's hard to work from is "just design something that sells." Give us a real starting point, and we'll build the concept around it.

05 Give clear, timely feedback.

During reviews, tell us what's working as well as what isn't, and be specific: "the hem feels too long," not "something feels off." Try to respond within a day or two. A collection keeps its momentum when feedback flows steadily.

Your Brief, in One Page

Fill this in before your first call with us or any other deigner/ agency:

- Brand name (if decided): _____
- Your customer: age, city, lifestyle _____
- Your seed of vision: _____
- Mood or feeling of the collection: _____
- Categories: _____
- Number of garments: _____
- Budget range: _____
- Target launch date: _____
- References (with one note each): _____

When you're ready, bring this along to a free first consultation with us. We'll go through it together and talk about where your collection could go.
